

Higher education reform in china pdf

Despite numerous transformations, China has established one of the largest higher education systems in the world. First, all higher education institutions are rigidly controlled and regulated by the central government and especially by the Communist Party. For instance, the Soviet Higher Education Model was introduced in China from 1949 to the end of the 1950s. In addition, the status of several Chinese universities has been steadily rising in global university rankings since the beginning of the 21st century. This is evident not only in the relations between the central government, local authorities, and higher education institutions but also in the government's arrangements and management of all higher education institutions.

China's higher education system has embraced technological advancements to enhance efficiency and management. A notable example is the widespread application of RFID (Radio Frequency Identification) technology across campuses. The Difference Between ID Cards. RFID systems are extensively used for student attendance tracking, where students swipe RFID cards to automatically record their entry into classrooms, thereby improving the accuracy of attendance records and reducing administrative burdens. Additionally, RFID technology plays a crucial role in library management, enabling self-service borrowing and returning of books, as well as efficient tracking of library resources. Beyond academic settings, RFID is also employed for access control and security purposes, ensuring safer campus environments. The integration of RFID technology into China's higher education system reflects the country's commitment to leveraging industrial technologies to modernize education and improve operational transparency.

Professor Futao Huang, based at the Research Institute for Higher Education of Hiroshima University, Japan, and co-investigator of the Global Higher Education Engagement Research Program at the Center for Global Higher Education, highlights these developments. China's gross enrollment rate for higher education reached 48% of the 18-year-old population in 2018. Finally, it is notable that China places significant importance on the practical aspects and utilities of higher education compared to many Western countries. For example, China has developed mandatory national-level programs for all graduate students, requiring them to earn approximately 12 academic credits in these programs before graduation.
